

SUPER COWBOY

STAINED GLASS SOULS

The wizard left Dustfall on a broom, carrying the girl's soul like a lantern.

At her funeral, her family looked up at the new window and saw the hero who had almost saved her.

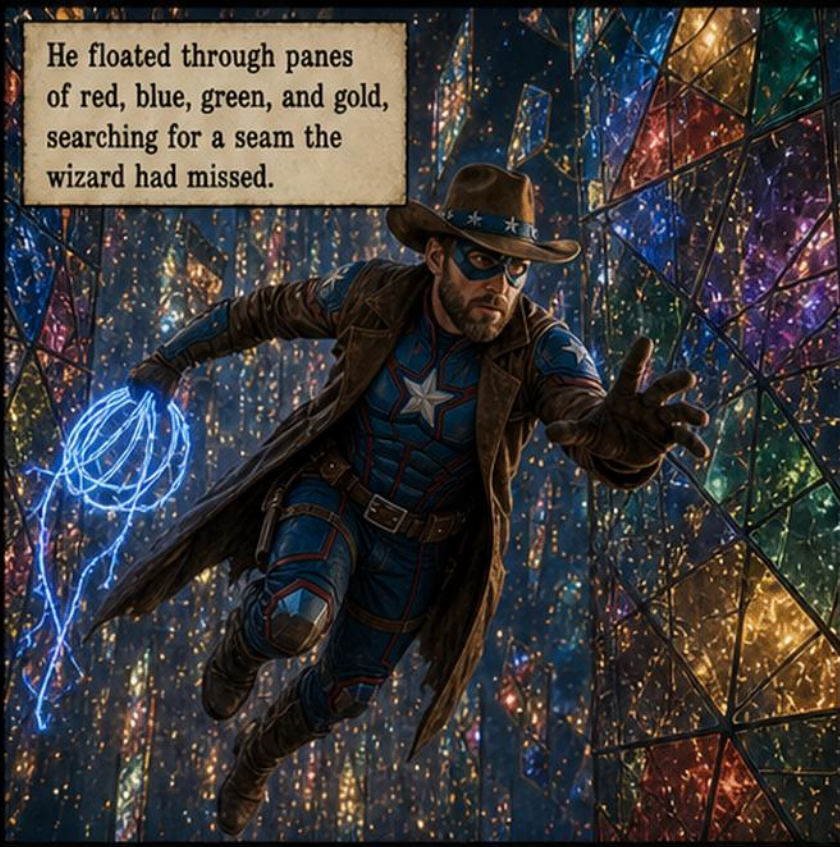

Some thanked Super Cowboy for trying. Others shouted that trying had not been enough.

Behind the glass, he heard every word and had no answer.

He floated through panes of red, blue, green, and gold, searching for a seam the wizard had missed.

Every path opened into more glass.

Outside, anger moved from the church house into Dustfall's streets.

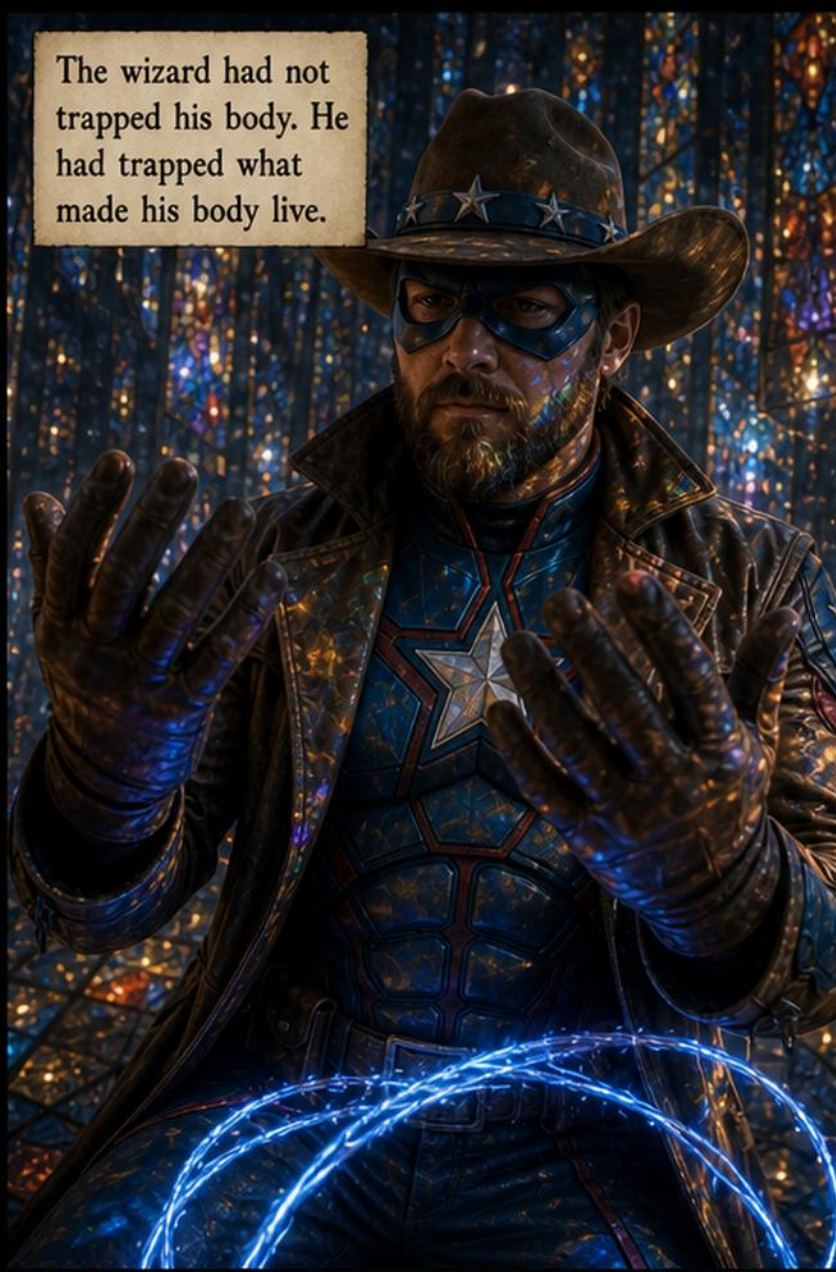

A doomsayer called the window an idol. Super Cowboy's supporters blocked the aisle.

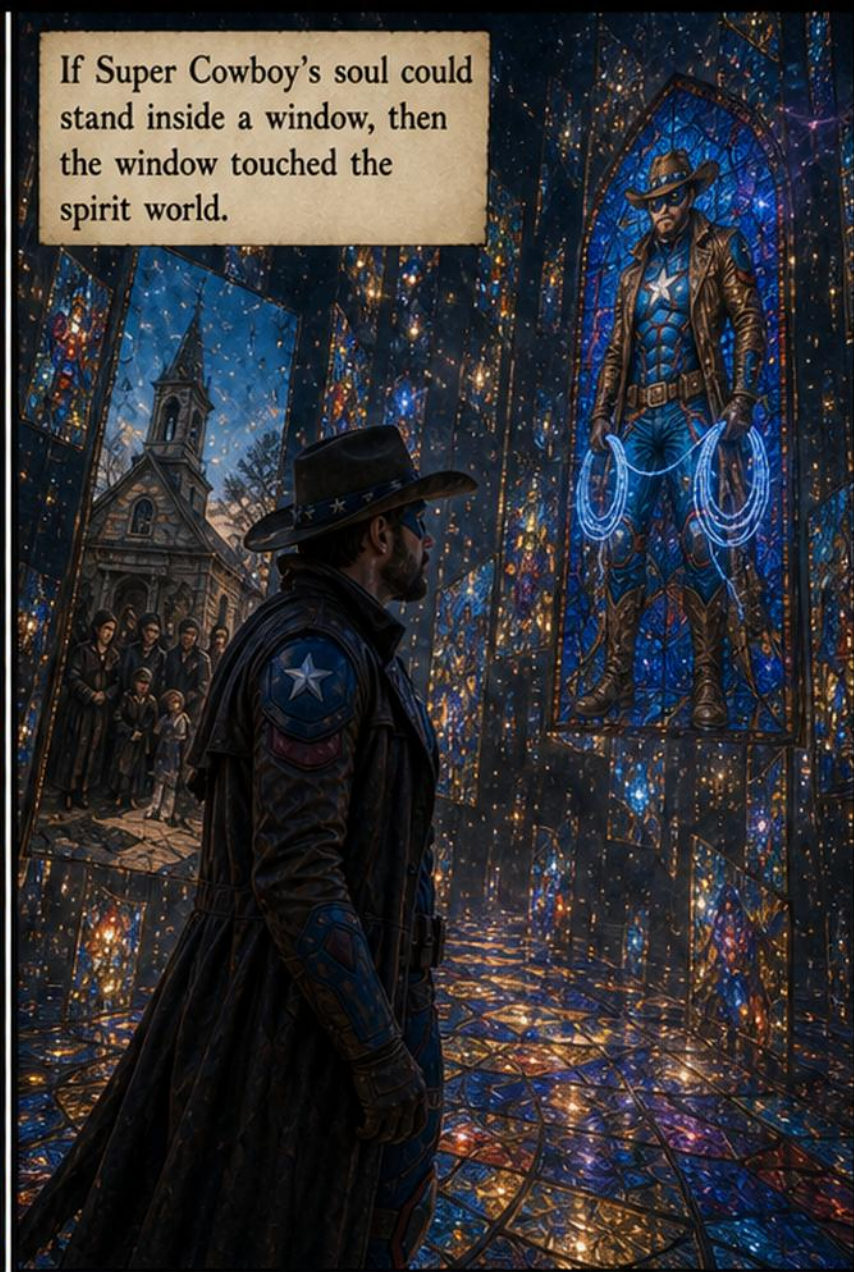

If they broke the glass too soon, they might break the only road home.

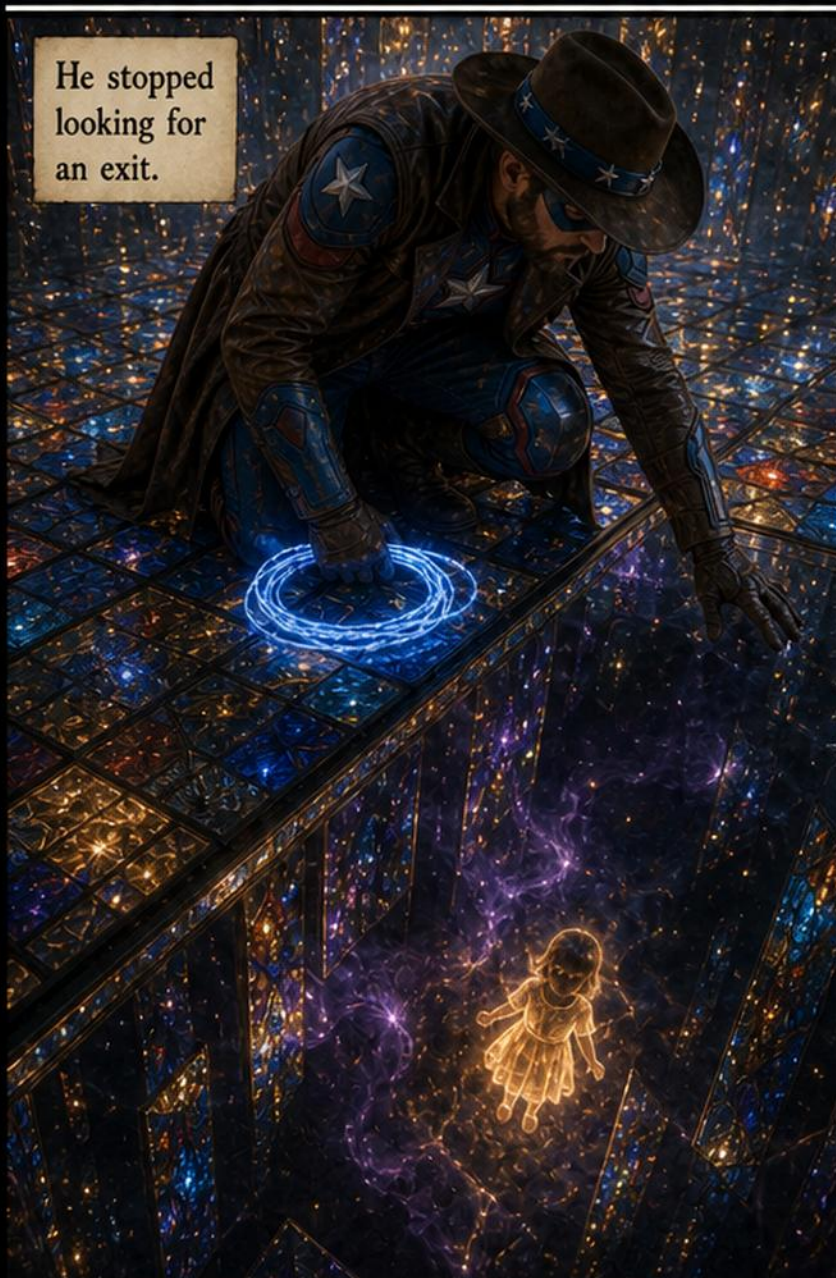

The wizard had not trapped his body. He had trapped what made his body live.

If Super Cowboy's soul could stand inside a window, then the window touched the spirit world.

He stopped looking for an exit.

He started looking for the girl.

The deeper road had guards.

The Damned came howling through broken panes.

Super Cowboy let the Light Lasso pull him faster than claws could close.

He caught one demon
by the ankle and swung
it like a wrecking ball.

When the glass
stopped shaking,
he knew he was on the right trail.

An angel stepped between him and the road ahead.

You have fought long enough. The storm
should have taken you years ago.

Come with me. Rest where heroes are not asked to bleed anymore.

Not while that girl is still locked away.

The angel honored the refusal and carried him to the wizard's hidden prison.

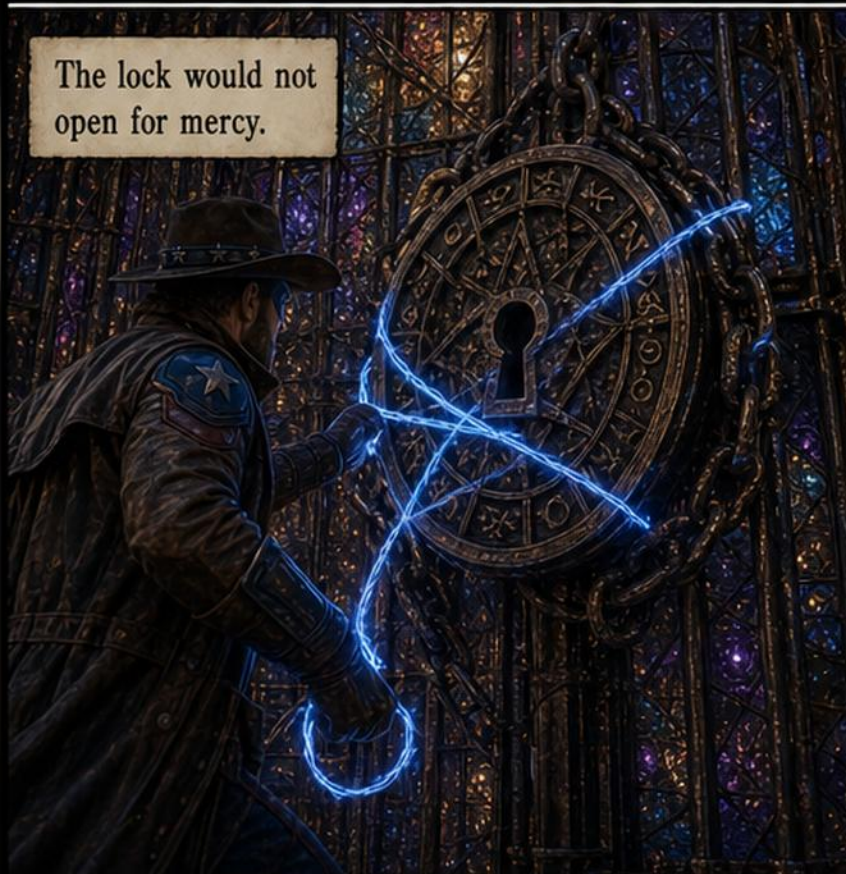

Innocent souls shone behind iron and glass.

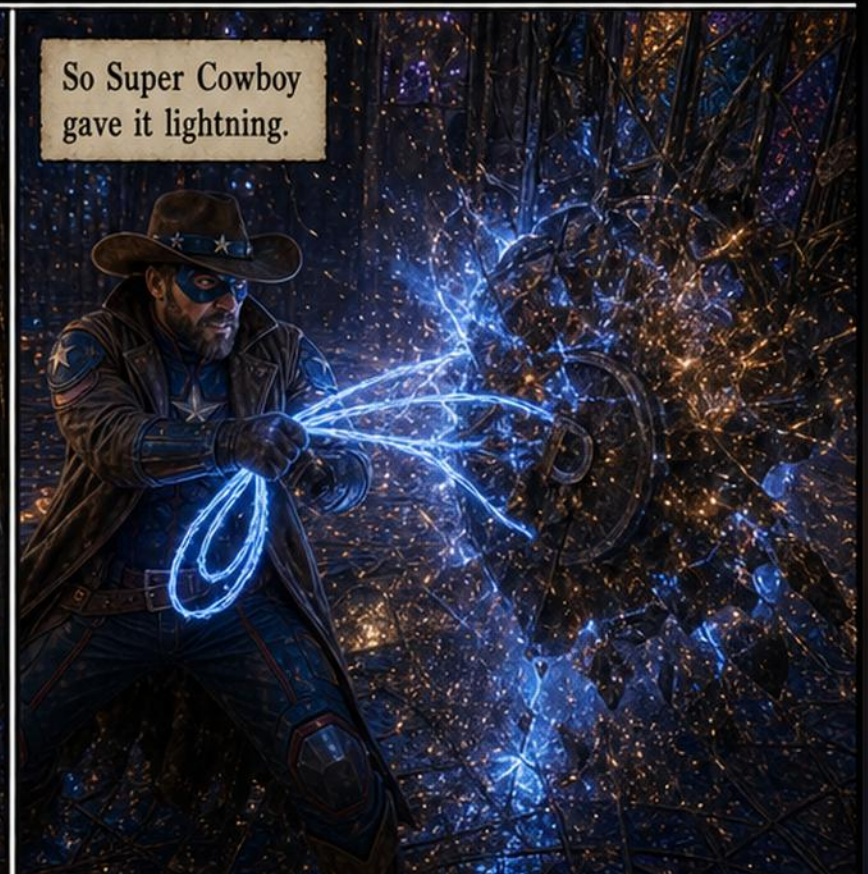

Their fear fed every spell the wizard had cast.

The lock would not open for mercy.

So Super Cowboy gave it lightning.

The prison opened, and the wizard's stolen power poured away.

Super Cowboy held the girl's hand and followed the Light Lasso home.

They burst from the window together, and Dustfall looked up in awe.

