

SUPERHERO ACTION COMICS

ISSUE 3:
THE GOD WHO
TURNED AWAY

Radiant Vector saved
three cities before sunrise
and still heard sirens
beyond the horizon.

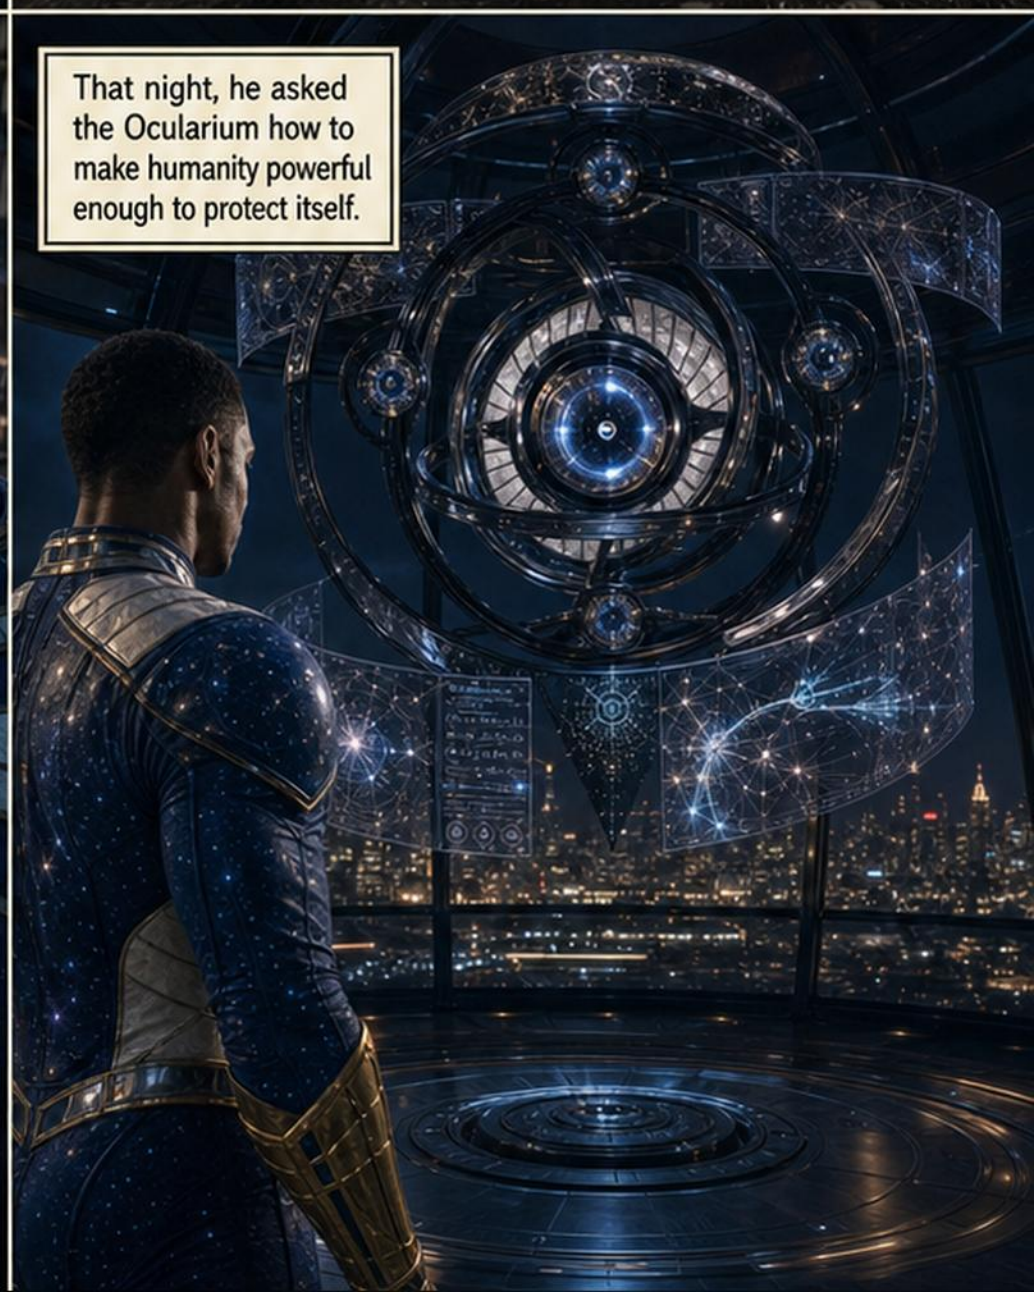

He was fast enough
to be everywhere
for a moment, never
long enough to stay.

A planet with so few
heroes would always be
one disaster behind.

That night, he asked
the Ocularium how to make humanity powerful
enough to protect itself.

The alien machine searched languages older than nations.

It found the Great Unweaving, the day public magic vanished from the world.

Before that day, every human mind could touch the mystic arts.

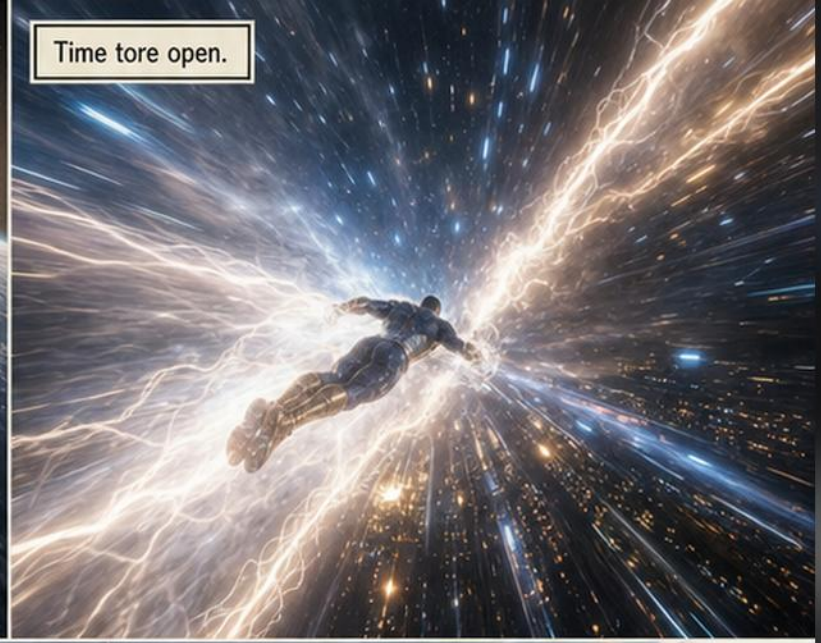

Radiant Vector saw a future where every citizen could defend the planet, and hope drowned out caution.

He ran faster
than weather, faster
than orbit, faster than
the calendar could hold.

Time tore open.

He arrived above a
coastal city shining with
impossible power.

Then the sky
split with spells.

Atlantis was not losing magic. Atlantis
was drowning in it.

There were no
powerless bystanders
in the war.

Every family carried a spell.
Every argument had artillery.

Shields saved one street
and shattered the next.

The city edge
began to dissolve
under stray lightning.

Radiant Vector finally saw
the cost of the miracle
he wanted.

He could save them.

He could stop
the Unweaving.

He could restore
magic to the future,
and give every hand
a power no world
could safely hold.

From the breaking
streets below, Atlantis
called him a god
and begged him to
choose them.

The future was not safe because power belonged to everyone.

It was safe because the few who carried power had chosen responsibility.

Radiant Vector turned away.

Atlantis sank, and magic went with it.

Centuries changed
truth into worship,
then worship into
accusation.

The people under
the sea remembered
the sky-god who
turned his back.

In time, they
decided he had
sunk Atlantis
himself.

The mage houses
ended their old
war for one
purpose.

Soon the ocean
would rise, and
Radiant Vector
would learn what
the deep had
trained to avenge.
