THE LAST BLOODLINE

Long ago beneath the sea, the sorcerer Maelor murdered his own relatives because each death divided the victim's magic among the surviving bloodline.

Ardan knew his evil brother would eventually target his infant granddaughter, Lyra, so he remade her with flight, immense strength, blazing eyes, freezing breath, and nearly indestructible flesh.

He sealed Lyra inside a crystal vessel and sent her thousands of years into the future, beyond Maelor's reach.

Maelor defeated Ardan, inherited most of his power, and discovered that one missing share still lived. Made ageless by stolen magic, he hunted Lyra across centuries, time, and strange dimensions.

Lyra's vessel finally opened in modern Meridian, where Caelum—the world's greatest champion and the last known survivor of an alien planet—found her.

Because Lyra shared Caelum's powers and remembered almost nothing, everyone assumed she was another survivor of his species.

Caelum trained her until she mastered her gifts and became Radiant. Captain Strategist, Laser Light, and Geomancer accepted her as a friend without demanding proof of where she came from.

Lyra and Caelum fell in love, but they refused to act on it while they might be biological relatives. He treasured her as the only family he believed remained from his lost world.

Maelor finally tore into Meridian and declared that Lyra was not an alien, but the last heir of his magical bloodline.

Caelum rejected the claim and attacked to protect her.

Maelor's spell nearly stopped Caelum's alien heart; his body was dangerously vulnerable to magic.

The same spell hurt Lyra far less. When she felt Maelor's bloodline magic answer inside her, she knew his terrible claim was true.

Lyra begged Maelor to stop. With every other relative dead, the two of them were the only family each had left.

Maelor answered that their shared blood was exactly why she had to die: her death would transfer the missing family power into him.

Lyra fought with blazing eyes, freezing breath, strength, flight, and nearly indestructible flesh.

But Maelor had prepared for centuries. His layered spells bound Lyra, crushed Caelum, and brought both heroes to defeat.

Before Maelor could kill Lyra, the friends she had made as Radiant arrived. They came because chosen family does not abandon its own.

Captain Strategist identified Maelor's linked wards and timed one precise combined attack between their pulses.

Geomancer trapped Maelor's feet and broke the ground sigils while Laser Light flooded his shadow shield until it shattered.

Their different abilities weakened Maelor's defenses and gave Lyra and Caelum one final opening.

Lyra and Caelum rose together and struck Maelor before his wards could rebuild.

Maelor died, and the full power of the bloodline passed into Lyra, making Radiant stronger than ever.

Victory gave her no joy. She mourned the last living connection to the forgotten home Ardan had sacrificed everything to save her from.

Caelum grieved too. The truth proved that Lyra was not the surviving piece of his lost planet that he had hoped she was.

In the quiet days that followed, Lyra understood that Captain Strategist, Laser Light, and Geomancer had already treated her as family without shared blood or birthplace.

Caelum understood the same truth: losing a biological connection did not erase the home they had built together.

Now that they knew they were not related, the fear that had kept their love buried was gone.

Above Meridian, Radiant and Caelum chose each other and shared their first quiet kiss.
